Psychology of Tattoos, Body Piercings and Sexual Activity

Tattoos and Piercings on Women

Women tend to get tattoos and piercings for decoration of their body. This is likely to be related to the evolutionary psychology of the desire of women to decorate themselves to attract a mate. This is reflected in other aspects of the female culture. Having hair styled, putting on make up, cosmetic surgery and expensive shoes.

Do Tattoos and Piercings Make Women More Attractive?

The answer to this is, sometimes. Probably not the answer you were looking for but allow me to explain. A study performed by Guéguen, 2013 asked several male participants on a beach to rate a woman on how easy they think it would be to have sex with them on the first date. Half of the time the woman had a temporary butterfly tattoo on and the other half of the time they had plain skin. The results were remarkable. The woman was thought to be far easier to approach when she was wearing the tattoo but it didn't have an effect on how attractive she was rated.

This could be because males are very visual creatures when it comes to sexual attraction and the tattoo or piercing could be seen as a signal of sexual availability. 'She likes to decorate herself perhaps shes trying to attract someone' could be the thoughts going on at a primeval level.

Some evidence would seem to back up this perception about women with piercings as well. According to the study performed by Rovardo & Colleen, 2010 women with body piercings were found to be more likely than women without to have premarital intercourse.

Tattoos and Piercings on Men

Tattoos and piercings on men are seen by themselves very differently than how women perceive their tattoos. Men often get tattoos as a mark of camaraderie or because of an event that they want to connect with.

With regards to how they see themselves afterwards, tattooed men view themselves as more attractive than men without tattoos and also report themselves as having more sexual activity Drews et al, 2000.

Do Tattoos and Piercings Make Men More Attractive?

Well again it does depend on your own personal preferences. Often it is more likely that women with tattoos will find men with tattoos more attractive because they have something in common, but many women tend to be attracted to the "bad boy" type and guys with tattoos can be seen as a bad boy. Also some women feel a man with tattoos can seem more manly, strong, or confident, which is always an attractive trait.

On the whole piercings in men are still seen to have a stigma and far less men have piercings than they have tattoos. Often ear piercings can have feminine connotations but body piercings in other parts of the body show a certain rebellious nature

Study: Can Sex Make You Smarter?

Pop science has a lot to say on the subject of sex's potential for a great (or not so great) work out, but maybe the corporeal focus is all wrong. New research points to headier benefits, suggesting that sex may actually make you smarter.

Separate studies conducted in Maryland and South Korea found evidence that mice that engaged in sexual activity experienced improved mental performance and neurogenesis (i.e., developed more neurons) in the hippocampus, the brain structure where long term memories are formed.

In April, a group from the University of Maryland reported that sexually active middle-aged rats exhibited better cognitive and hippocampal functioning. Meanwhile, researchers from Konkuk University in Seoul concluded in November that sex could offset the detrimental effects of stress, like impaired memory and overall cognitive functioning.

“Sexual interaction could be helpful for buffering adult hippocampal neurogenesis and recognition memory function against the suppressive actions of chronic stress,” the research team from South Korea wrote.

While sex may indeed help grow neurons, the jury is still out on analogous effects of porn. A group from the University of Texas reported the opposite phenomenon with regard to porn (watching porn worsens memory), but researchers from UCLA quickly issued a visceral rebuttal.

Tattoos and Piercings in the Workplace

Tattoos and piercings are becoming more accepted as a form of art and expression. They are a big part of the cultural landscape in cosmopolitan cities like Dallas. To give you an idea of their rise in popularity here are a few figures. Thirty years ago, 1 in 100 people in this country had tattoos. Now 1 in 10 Americans have them, and one-third of those are 25 to 30. While society is becoming more liberated and expressive, and piercings and tattoos become part of mainstream culture, some employers are still having a hard time wrapping their heads around body art in the workplace.

What are my rights?

If your company tells you that you can't wear piercings or reveal your tattoos at work, they aren't doing anything illegal. Don't look to the legal system to protect workers who have body art. The law covers discrimination on the grounds of race, color, religion, age, nationality, origin and gender. The one exception may be if you're a Hindu with a nose ring, which could be a religious observation.

But there are limits. Your company can't use tats or piercings as an excuse to fire you. A company can, on the flipside, use it as an excuse not to hire you.

Many companies have policies that prohibit tats and piercings that are generally outlined in their handbook and/or employee manual. If the policy is new, it may be given out in memo form (or they may revise the current employee handbook). An employer may change a dress code at any time, with or without warning. To cover their derrières legally, the employer will generally give the new guidelines in written form. If an employer does change the dress code, it must be applicable to all employees.

What's all the hoopla?

In a recent Vault.com survey, employers and employees were asked about tattoos and piercings in the workplace. 60 percent of employers said that they were less likely to hire a candidate with tats or piercings. Their main concern was how the company would be viewed and/or represented. Although the demand for skilled workers is high and filling jobs has been difficult, some managers are willing to pass on workers who they believe could tarnish the company image.

But why do people think less of those with body art or piercings? Some people still associate tattoos with bikers, sailors, criminals, gang members — the pariahs of society. You might see it as self-expression and free speech, but your boss (or potential boss) perceives it as being rebellious, calling attention to yourself, and not being part of the team.

Many employers have a cookie cutter mentality of how their workers should dress and be perceived. Surprisingly, Starbucks, the McDonald's of the coffee world, doesn't allow their baristas to show tats or piercings; all tats must be covered up and piercings removed. They're going for the crisp, clean look and want to let their coffee — rather than the worker's appearance—do the talking. If you don't like the Starbucks policy, you might try serving coffee at a smaller, local coffeehouse.

The times they are a' changing

While some employers cringe at bodywork and piercings, others are embracing it. If you choose a position where you don't interact with clients, or are pursuing an artistic career, you're more likely not to have a problem at work. Here is the official policy of some employers at the time of this writing:

- Walmart, doesn't allow facial piercings. They do allow tattoos that aren't offensive; 'offensive' tattoos must be covered up.
- Borders, one of the nation's largest book sellers, views body art and piercings as something that makes a worker more interesting and a definite plus.
- Ford Motor Company allows everyone from Senior Executives on down to have tattoos and piercings. The only exception is that factory workers are asked to refrain from piercings that could endanger factory settings and/or worker safety.

If you have tattoos and piercings how should you handle it at work?

Walking into work (or an interview) with a giant dragon on your arm probably isn't a good idea. Modest tats (ones that can be covered up with your pants or a shirt sleeve and/or are small in size) are probably okay. You can take out some of your earrings if you have multiple piercings and/or a nose or eyebrow ring. Or, go for studs instead of large hoops. The piercing through the septum (the one that looks like a bull ring) and large earplugs aren't usually well received. Large tats (especially ones on your neck or arms) and tongue piercings seem to concern employers the most.

Another good idea is camouflage. Cover your tats with concealer or band-aids. Women can wear bangles or other large bracelets to cover tats on their wrists and still be quite stylish. You can choose to wear long sleeved shirts or long pants and women can wear thick tights and/or strappy heels to conceal tats on their legs and ankles.

Some piercings can't be left without jewelry all day long. You can use retainer jewelry, which are just clear pieces of plastic to keep your piercings open, or wear clear or flesh-colored plastic balls on your tongue ring.

The Vault.com survey revealed that 70 percent of the people with tattoos whom they surveyed concealed them at work, while 30 percent didn't. A good gauge might be to look around your office (or come into the office to look around before your interview) and see if others are wearing their piercings and not concealing their tats. If there is nothing in your employee manual, you can remove and cover up until you're sure. Many states are at-will employment and have initial 90-day trial periods, so if you really like your job you must weight the importance of your body art and piercings against continued employment.

Prosecutors Charge ‘Octomom’ With Welfare Fraud

“Octomom” Nadya Suleman, the mother of octuplets who went on to film the Wicked Pictures solo-masturbation video “Octomom Home Alone,” could face nearly six years in jail for allegedly failing to disclose nearly $30,000 in earnings when she applied for welfare last year, prosecutors said Monday.

Suleman is scheduled to be arraigned Friday with one count of aid by misrepresentation and two counts of perjury by false application for aid, the Los Angeles County District Attorney’s Office said.

Suleman, who has a total of 14 children, illegally received $16,481 in welfare payments — $6,667 from the CalWorks financial assistance program and $9,814 from the CalFresh food aid program — during the first six months of 2013, the complaint said.

Suleman filed for welfare in Lancaster in January and February of last year, but in the following months didn’t report all of her income from personal appearances and residuals from videos, according to the complaint.

“She allegedly failed to report the extra income she earned between Jan. 1, 2013, and June 30, 2013,” according to prosecutors.

In the 2012 film “Octomom Home Alone,” Suleman pleasures herself in three different erotic scenarios.

The Brad Armstrong-directed DVD was distributed exclusively by Wicked Pictures, and Suleman later promoted the title nationwide in book signings and in numerous media appearances on TV and radio.

The 30-minute “Octomom: Home Alone” includes such unique bonuses as an in-depth interview with Suleman — conducted by Wicked Pictures exclusive Jessica Drake — and a behind-the-scenes featurette documenting Suleman’s long journey to Porn Valley and the production of her first adult video.

“I’m a more sexual being for having done this,” Suleman said in the video. “It’s the best, most powerful and most liberating thing I’ve ever done.”

Suleman first gained notoriety — and her Octomom moniker — in 2009 when she gave birth to octuplets after undergoing a controversial in vitro procedure.

As Suleman’s story made headlines around the world, it was soon discovered that her previous six children had also been conceived through in vitro fertilization.

ReJigger Cocktail Maker

The New Tool Every Bachelor Needs

ReJigger is a simple and fast bar tool that makes creating cocktails dead simple. If you want to impress your guests with some cocktails but aren't a fan of getting all the measurements right, this thing is definitely for you. The actual device is a simple plastic mold with three compartments, each containing the proportions found in most common cocktail recipes. With it comes a simple recipe sheet, and all you have to do is pour the ingredients into each compartment, put a standard pint glass on top and shake, and then use the ReJigger to strain into a glass. Being able to quickly and easily make cocktails is definitely nice, but the coolest part of the ReJigger is that it makes experimentation really easy. Since the proportions are already measured out for you, it's easy to swap out different types of spirits, liqueurs, and juices and invent your own cocktails. It's sort of like the training wheels of home cocktail creation.

THE HARD SCORE

by Pat "Two Dogs" Snow
To Bark Back Email:
tx2dogs@verizon.net

Joining in is a great American pastime. It's fun, gets us off the couch, and generally adds some excitement to our days. There are times, of course, when doing so can all of a sudden have your life go south on you, but if you survive you may have something to make a movie about. Or just have you get home and nestle down and make a solemn oath to never go outside again.

That's what this column is about to do for me, either land me in the middle of offers to buy my wings and beer or force me to move out in the dark of night.

Yeah, you got it, I'm joining in the post-game arguments and gnaw on the last two standing. And, you'll never believe this, make prophecy about the upcoming Super Bowl. That's a bowl of Wheaties and Cheerios and Cap'n Crunch all combined. Let's get 'er on.

The losers.

New England Patriots. What a season and what a testament to coaches and players committed to playing as a team, working as effectively as they could, and overcoming adversity that would have drowned most everyone else.

Their defense was without All-Pro tackle Vince Wilfork, a major loss on that line, who was injured at season's beginning. You can't just go out and replace a player of that caliber during a season, if ever.

Then their offense was without both their starting tight ends, Hernandez and Gronkowski, due to criminal conduct and physical injury. That was potentially a season ender, which most thought would be the case, because that offense was built around the double TE configuration.

They had their troubles during the season, losses that should have sunk them in their division and conference, but they kept keeping up then began to get better then began to take over their division and conference. Through very determined effort, they earned a first round bye, hosted the Colts in the Division round, and then went on to Denver for the AFC Conference Championship game. Not too shabby for a team many thought were hamstrung from the start.

The Patriots and the AFC title game. My biggest question I had from the opening kickoff was, where's the running game? The first three possessions were all three and out and no runs. There were minimal runs the rest of the game.

A week before with a running attack that decimated the Colts and put up seven TD's was an afterthought in this game. Why? Belichick won't answer that. The world probably won't know until fifty years after Bill's death when his archives are opened, and that'll probably be redacted out.

The only real stain that's hit New England was put on there by Belichick himself by turning his venom on ex-Pat, Wes Welker. Bill claims Welker deliberately hit and injured cornerback Talib on a pick during opposing crossing patterns. That's bull Bill, it was legit, and this is just a part of that nasty business when your itchy bitsy feelings got hurt when he didn't want to work for paupers wages. Note to Bill: tyrants never last and the last thing they taste is bitter.

San Francisco 49ers. Their season wasn't as injury plagued, and they did have to wait for receiver Crabtree to get back, but it sure began as a roller coaster. They had to take the wild card route to get in, and beat a tough Panthers defense, but they got to the NFC title match. Yet I'm not sure what they had in mind when they got there.

Kaepernick just didn't seem focused, more like at times in a cloud. I'm guessing that as his running game was shut down by Seattle, he was more and more perplexed. Did he get some runs in? Sure, but most of them never converted the drive to points.

While his down the field passes were generally fine, the sides were foreign to him. Getting the ball in-between two defenders to your receiver is one of the toughest passes to make, and he just wasn't able to get the air under them with the right arc coming down to hit it. That last pass to Crabtree in the end zone was way short, he didn't throw it to the corner where only the receiver could get it, a common pass amongst seasoned quarterbacks.

And that's the case here, Kaepernick is only in his second year. The issue for him is, can he become a pocket passer and operate under center? Can he learn to throw finesse passes? Can he learn to manage the game clock better? If anybody can find out, Harbaugh can.

The Niners and the NFC title game. Same question with the start, what happened to the Niners running game? Gore couldn't run for an ice cream let alone a few yards. The defense was playing a great game, but the offense was way off. Was that a result of Seattle's defense or they just couldn't execute?

Last week both the Patriots and 49ers put on running attacks that took apart their opponents. The question now is, did they leave too much of it on those fields?

The Denver Broncos. What else can be said, they came to play on both sides of the ball. In their second season with Peyton they now have a deep understanding of commitment to the team and game and winning. Yeah, he impacts both sides of the ball. That's leadership.

Like the others, they didn't run early and it did not become a major part of the offense. Hitting all designed five receivers plus the random, that's what kept New England back on their heels. The game philosophy was to attack, and attack, and attack.

New England held Denver to just 26 points, a dramatic reduction in points scored, a very worthy effort, but the Broncos turned around and held the Pat's to just 16 points, that against one very celebrated QB, Tom Brady.

The Seattle Seahawks. And they too, like the other three, could not get their running game going. Lynch was not a factor except on one run, now that converted to a TD, but other than that, he was not a threat. They trailed the Niners most of the game and barely took them out 23 – 17. Had not the 49ers messed around with clock management and Kaepernick making rookie mistakes, this game could easily have ended differently, it was that close of a contest.

Wilson has been struggling in the pocket and with the passing game, like Kaepernick it showed in this game. He too, is in just his second season so there’s room to grow. While Seattle is doing a lot of crowing now, deservedly so, they were a very nervous bunch going into that fourth quarter.

The Super Bowl.

Is this the matchup for the ages? No. Will it be a good game and not a blow out like many have been? Or at least not too one-sided? Frankly, that’s what remains to be seen.

Seattle has the edge in their stadium and the twelfth man phenomena, but this is going to be across the country in an open air stadium under what will probably be some seriously cold and wintry conditions, unless New Jersey Governor Christie can bully the elements. Denver has more experience playing under snow and ice and freeze conditions.

Seattle has one of the best defenses in the NFL, no argument, these guys have earned their bones. If the weather isn’t monster bad they’ll have a good time. The running game with Lynch will have to be strong, there’s no dancing around that. Frozen field, snow, freezing temps, doesn’t matter, Lynch will have to be the key to Seattle’s victory.

Can Wilson have success passing? Tom Brady didn’t. And that’s with their starting corner out for the rest of the season. Wilson’s no Brady. His best bet at having success just may be a bad field, which would also affect the defenders.

The Denver Broncos are having a whale of a good season. They’re having fun, they’re overcoming obstacles like injuries, and they’re about as confident a team that any can be. The whole team has bought into the Manning demanding drive for consistency and aggressiveness.

Can their passing game succeed? Yes. But here’s the drill, just like in last week’s conference games, where all four teams were totally committed to stopping the run, that’s probably what would/should happen here. Can they do it? Can they both run Moreno successfully and stop Lynch?

Manning will have more success than Wilson regardless of weather conditions, but that doesn’t mean that he can pass each play or be able to. If the weather’s bad, and there are indications that a big storm is supposed to be brewing, the game will start with who can run and end with who can pass.

Foul weather or fair, Manning’s experience at the helm is what will bring this ship home. Peyton wins his second of three Super Bowl trips. That, and a defense that will be just enough to keep Lynch in check and slow down Wilson.

Readers Response:

Two Dogs:

If Percy Harvin gets to play for the Seahawks in the Super Bowl, that will be the icing that breaks Denver’s cake. He’s one of the top receivers in the NFL and they won’t be able to stay with him after he catches the ball. Our defense takes Manning and his second level receivers out of the game and we run right over that second rate defense.

Matt – Tacoma

Matt:

Harvin didn’t have an off season with Seattle, the hip surgery took care of that, and he didn’t get any regular season time, except for one game where he had two plays and was gone. The problem is he and Wilson don’t know each other and in games that’s a very crucial piece of the puzzle. That’s what the off season and early parts of the regular season are for. With the timing off, does Wilson throw it too far in front, too far behind, over his head, where? A mistake like that in the Super Bowl against Denver’s defense can be a very costly one.

TD

Two Dogs:

I’ve been hearing that Colin Kaepernick is the main reason San Francisco lost that game to Seattle, do you think that’s true?

Dana – Oakland

Dana:

Many things contribute to victories and losses, so pinning it all on Kaepernick is not right, but he did make his share of mistakes. One of his big ones was when he’d break from the pocket he’d go to the left side, usually the short side bringing more defenders into an already crowded area, and he’s a right handed passer so throwing the ball was against his motion. But this is only his second year, first full year, and hopefully he’ll learn more about being under center and his relationship with the pocket. Even with Harbaugh as his coach, he may struggle next year.

TD

Two Dogs:

Why are people doubting that Johnny Manziel can be a success in the NFL? He’s competed at the highest level in college, the SEC, and won the highest of honors out there, the Heisman. He’s shown he can be a leader and carry out assignments, I think he’ll be just like RGIII, Luck, and Wilson, an instant success.

Michelle – College Station

Michelle:

First of all, the game is different. And he has maturity issues. And he’s been taught how to run the spread offense out of the shotgun. And he runs sandlot when plays breakdown. Notice his first year he had major success. Notice his second year was more difficult. The NFL isn’t college where each team makes up their own schedules and pull games with scrub teams. By the way, most Heisman winners aren’t NFL winners.

TD

Two Dogs:

You got your butt kicked again all Isoers like you. You dont know crap about football.

Jason – Racine

Jason:

I didn’t make any selections, I said the games were a pick. Here’s a game you’d probably be good at: place your left index finger in your nose, then your right index finger in your mouth then keep doing a high speed switch. Since you’ve been doing this slowly since birth, by speeding it up you could compete internationally.

TD

Two Dogs:

Are the Dallas Stars going to make a run for the playoffs? This team doesn’t look like it’s going anywhere except down and won’t make it in. An excuse coming out is they’re too small and bigger teams just wear them down by late in the third, causing the late losses. I thought this new owner and GM and coach knew what they’re doing?

Katie – Dallas

Katie:

You have a valid concern and point. For the last several years they have been losing games late, this isn’t just a new problem. That said, size is a problem, although some of that may have to include the heart of some players and spirit of the team. This isn’t a bad team, it’s just still going through growing issues and size and puck control players will be brought in. It doesn’t happen in just a couple of years, not for how far down they were. Don’t lose heart, the owner has a very good idea of what he wants this team to be, and he’s got the people to help him find the players to put in place. If you haven’t been going to any home games, you need to, they’re really fun to watch.

TD

Two Dogs:

I’m not a conspiracy nut, and mostly watch football because of my husband and sons, but even I have to say that the officiating in the Seattle and San Francisco game was almost blatantly anti 49ers. I hear that the NFL is going to take a look at some calls becoming reviewable but that doesn’t help now, does it. When a play takes place right in front of an official and he doesn’t call it, that’s alarming, and it does begin to beg the question, did the league “want” Seattle in to face Denver?

Cicely – Marietta

Cicely:

There are always conspiracy theories flowing like water, and you’ve tapped a good one. Some feel that Seattle is being helped because of what they felt was a blown call that cost them their only visit to the Super Bowl. Some feel the Niners are also being “paid back” for some questionable decisions years ago. While human error certainly is valid for most missed or bad calls, it doesn’t seem to explain them all, does it? The problem the league faces with adding more instant replay is that it slows the game down, and they do not want that. Letting coaches challenge more, if not anything they want to, is a very good answer because if the call is overturned, they keep a challenge, and if they’re wrong, they lose it and a time out. But the officials need to be able to address more calls.

Poll: Strong Majority Of Washington, DC Residents Want Marijuana Legal

Residents of the District of Columbia favor legalizing marijuana for adults, according to the findings of a Washington Post poll, released Wednesday.

Sixty-three percent of respondents said that they favor “legalizing the possession of small amounts of marijuana for personal use.”

Thirty-four percent of respondents said that they opposed legalization. However, among those respondents, nearly half (16 percent) acknowledged support for reducing the criminal penalties for marijuana offenses.

Members of the DC Committee on Public Safety this week voted unanimously in favor of legislation amending local marijuana possession penalties from a criminal misdemeanor (punishable by up to 6 months incarceration and a maximum fine of $1,000) to a civil infraction (punishable by a $25 fine for possession and a $100 fine for public consumption). The full City Council is expected to act on the measure shortly.

Any legislation approved by the DC City Council may be overridden by an act of Congress.

A 2012 analysis published by the American Civil Liberties Union of Maryland reported that DC possesses the highest percentage of marijuana possession arrests per capita in the nation.

New Hampshire: House Members Vote In Favor Of Measure To Legalize And Regulate Marijuana

Members of the New Hampshire House of Representatives on Wednesday voted 170 to 162 in favor of legislation, House Bill 492, to legalize the personal use and/or cultivation of marijuana by persons 21 years of age or older and to establish regulations for the retail production and sale of cannabis.

The vote marks the first time that a state legislative chamber has ever voted in favor of legislation to legalize and regulate marijuana for adults.

Said NORML Communications Director Erik Altieri, “Fifty-eight percent of Americans support ending the prohibition of marijuana and the New Hampshire House lawmakers’ actions signal that politicians are beginning to acknowledge the will of their constituents.”

House lawmakers last year rejected a similar measure by a vote of 239 to 112.

Members of the House Ways and Means Committee will now further debate the measure’s potential financial implications. The full House is anticipated to vote once again on the measure in the coming months.

Democrat Gov. Maggie Hassan has stated publicly that she opposes the measure and that she would veto it if it reaches her desk.

For more information, please contact Allen St. Pierre, NORML Executive Director, or Erik Altieri, NORML Communications Director, at (202) 483-5500.

The Good Men In Your Life

Why You Need Better Friends

In truth, you are where you are today because of the good men in your life. These men have become more than mere drinking buddies, coworkers or wingmen; they are exceptionally indispensable members of your inner circle and you simply cannot live without them. When your story is written, the roles they played will be pivotal.

Determining the good men in your life is absolutely necessary in molding your success. These men, who refuse to accept anything subpar in their career, lifestyle and women, help you become the best man you can possibly be at any given moment in your life. Your proximity to them is what will help you achieve more in all aspects of your life.

Men among great men

When good women aren't there for you, the good men in your life will help you get through any burdens you carry or crosses you bear. The men you want in your life are the ones who will fight the fight, whether verbal or physical, and refuse to back down when the enemy is present. These men will stand by you to get you where you need to be and they'll give you the strength to do it on your own when you think you can't.

They can sometimes be your best defense.

Consequences of negativity

A good example, led by good intentions, spreads massive amounts of positivity. Negative men have no place in your life; negativity can bring the best of men down. Asking you to accept less to help their wellness is toxic to your well-being and not only do you have the right to cut these people out of your life, you should. There is no room for negativity when you're trying to improve as a man, so cut it out.

These negative men prevent you from becoming a Better Man because they can't identify with what it means to improve oneself.

Good men give points - they don't take them

Good men worth anything are the ones who give credit where credit is due. They don't point out what you did wrong, unless done constructively, in your moment of glory. You should consider it a red flag and reevaluate having these men in your life if they rain on your parade. A man negatively criticizes the success of another because he has his own self-esteem issues, and that doesn't give him the right to diminish your high points.

Be firm in removing negativity from your life. Good men enable your fortunes by pushing you to your best; they don't push you in the opposite direction. And good men don't expect much in return.

Great men are contagious

Successful men breed success in others, and great men have inspired others to become great. When a man's skills are strong, they'll attract competition (a sense to compete and become better than the other). As a result, men find greatness because of the great men around them; men will always try to achieve more, drawing inspiration from those they admire. Healthy, competent competition is the source that inspires men to become excellent.

the final word

Remember these men in your life, past and present. Surround yourself with them because they'll help you succeed in life — and seeing you succeed is reward enough for them.

SexToy.com Launches 1st Sex Doll Into Space

Leading sex toy distributor CNV.com announced that it successfully launched an inflatable doll named Missy into space, and has the video footage to prove it.

The doll launched from Burton Creek State Park, just west of Lake Tahoe using a 4.5 pound balloon filled with about 300 cubic feet of hydrogen. It achieved an ascent rate of approximately 1,400 feet per minute, with its flight path taking it directly over Lake Tahoe, Carson City and then over the deep desert as it climbed to over 100,000 feet above earth.

Missy remained intact up to an altitude of over 100,000 feet, withstanding extreme temperatures and radiation, the company said in a statement. At 102,000 feet, the craft’s balloon popped and began to rapidly fall back down to earth. Upon re-entry to the earth’s atmosphere, the doll was ripped apart and lost somewhere in the Nevada desert.

“We modified the air plug on the back so that it equalized with outside pressure throughout the flight,” CNV Owner Dave Levine said. “The doll was just filled with air, but enough was allowed to vent during the course of the flight so as to prevent explosion.”

While the radio network did not always receive the tracking information sent by the balloon, CNV said it maintained contact using ground-based receivers and backup systems. “Three high-definition cameras recorded up to altitudes of approximately 60,000 feet, yielding the best video of a sex toy in space ever,” Levine added.

A team hiked six miles from an accessible road to recover the cameras and SD cards with flight video intact.

While Missy is clothed in the footage, she actually comes nude. To meet the first blow-up doll in space, go here www.sextoy.com/Mens-Sex-Toys/Sex-Dolls/Female/Missy-in-Space/sku-PD3523-00

Levine, AKA “Sex Toy Dave,” began CNV in 1995 and says he successfully launched the first vibrator in space in 2011.

Men And Aging

Should You Be Afraid Of Aging?

For a million reasons relating to fragmentation of media ownership, political expediency and sheer human biliousness, we are constantly being manipulated into fiercely oppositional camps: liberals vs. conservatives, red vs. blue, urban vs. rural. There is a culture war going on, or being made to go on, and it is killing our ability to speak to each other.

This, in part, is why we're ignoring the epiphenomena of man-site vs. woman-site hostility in order to look at the discussion surrounding Elizabeth Wurtzel's recent piece for The Atlantic on aging.

Let's sum it up, if we can: Elizabeth Wurtzel goes to cool Brooklyn parties where men express disbelief that she has been alive for 45 years. Her secret, she feels, has something to do with being childless, politically liberal and defiant in a very general sense.

In response, Jezebel writer Tracy Moore notes that while it's fun when Wurtzel acts so Wurtzely, denial may not be a universally satisfying solution to the fact that we all grow older and die. In passing, Moore also states that "it's harder for women to age." Is it?

We suspect that it is. For a pretty broad array of reasons (some cultural, more evolutionary), women are judged by their youthfulness, for which beauty is a proxy, more than men are, with the closest analogue on our side being wealth or prominence.

One of the things that distinguishes (we're being general here because there are about three billion of us) the male dialogue from its female counterpart is its (sometimes blinkered) pragmatism. For whatever reason, we tend to speak about injustice- or imbalance-containing problems in a way that ignores the moral question in favor of directives on how to make it work. This is the reason, for example, that a site like AskMen's "Power & Money" section is full of articles like "10 Ways To Think Like A CEO" and "How To Stay Out Of Debt," rather than things like "It Happened To Me: She Judged Me For My Money."

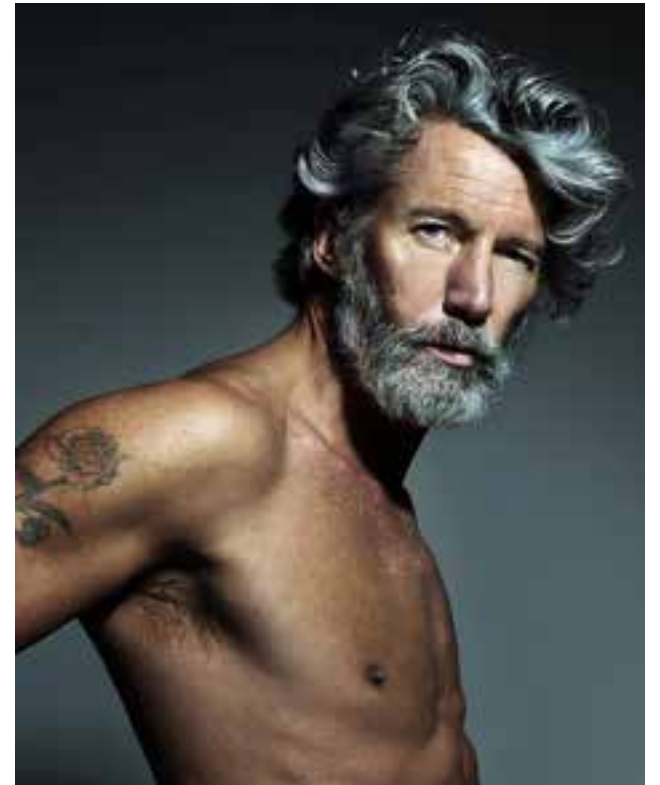

It's not that we don't experience life in the negative — we do, and very acutely. It's just that our taboo-structure, or our internal culture, contains this strong sense that to dwell on a bad feeling is to create the conditions for its re-occurrence. Out of this grows a generalized preference for advice over confession, and also something that can appear to women as shallowness.

It isn't likely that a man would derive the same pleasure (and the same discursive ability) from an age-related compliment as Elizabeth Wurtzel has. Aging, or more directly, being seen by potential sex partners as "old," is not a paramount male fear. But being seen as a loser is.

For men, that's the one. That, ladies, is our "fat," that's our "old." There is nothing worse to be called by a woman, because, like those two aesthetic criticisms that they so dread hearing from us, it's final. Once you hear that one, there's nothing left to do but go. You leave the party, you wonder if your dad also thinks that you suck, and you go home to Google something like "how not to be a loser." That's why men's sites are the way that they are. The difference between men and women does not go all the way down. We are both mortal beings — "Poor Things," to use Alasdair Gray's perfect formulation — and we are both experiencing a limited, mysterious flicker of consciousness before heading into an endless unknown.

For men, aging is an enormous existential concern, but less of a social and sexual one. We share Tracey Moore's general suspicion, though, that over-emphasizing the sexual aspects of aging can warp our perception of the whole thing. If we lose all sight of the wisdom, or the dreaded-but-true realizations that characterize growing old, we will quickly become a society of children: beautiful but ignorant, sexy but rapacious, innocent but cruel.

Men may not experience aging as the looming sexual threat that women do, but as people, we experience similar concerns about perceived weakness. And let's face it: Even for men, once you find yourself on the brink of "loserhood," or sexual undesirability, things like wrinkles and ear hair aren't exactly going to help. There exists a strain of masculine thought that holds that sexuality is all there is, that we are biological machines whose only natural purpose, or role, is to voraciously spread seed. Men of this inclination tend to regard meditations like those of Elizabeth Wurtzel or Tracey Moore as sad rationalizations, what they call spinings of the female "hamster-wheel": Futile efforts whose only goal is to prevent others from noting time's passing. But what is life like for people who place these things at its center? We have had youth-worshiping societies atop the earth before. We have seen the Vestal Virgins, sung about Ganymede and Zeus, watched the gladiators cut each other to pieces for money. And maybe it was sort of beautiful. But it was also cruel and arbitrary, and ended poorly.

Ultimate Entertainer Of The Year

By: Ms. Misha Morê

The current Miss Nude presented The Inaugural Ultimate Entertainer at the Wild J's Gentlemens Club in Canute, OK and it was hosted by Poppa J and Shawn Simms.

The contestants battled it out with giant props, creative costumes, soapy suds, messy erotic shows and pole routines that wowed the audience. This is the fifteenth year for this competition and no one was disappointed as the wonderful set of contestants, stepped it up during the night with some incredible stage shows.

On Saturday Night, the Pole Dance Contest, The Blindfold Contest, and the Line Dance Contest went on during the Finals and led to the eventual crowing of The Ultimate Entertainer Of The Year 2013.

The Winner received the top prize of $1500 and $750 went to the Pole Champion.

The 2013 Winners:

Miss Ultimate Entertainer: Ryan Ashley

Miss Ultimate Entertainer, 1st Runner Up: Artemis Moon

Miss Ultimate Entertainer, 2nd Runner Up: Lilith Sinn

Miss Wild J: Madison Wilds

Miss Wild J, 1st Runner Up: Brandy

Miss Wild J, 2nd Runner Up: Amira Rose

Miss Ultimate Entertainer of the Year: Ryan Ashley

Miss Ultimate Entertainer Pole Champion: Ryan Ashley

Miss Ultimate Entertainer Performer of the Year: Artemis Moon

Miss Ultimate Entertainer WOW Award: Miss Piper
Miss Ultimate Entertainer Miss Congentiality: Artemis Moon

A huge thank you goes out to the Wild J's Owners, Momma & Poppa J and staff, all sponsors and supporters for successfully hosting and participating in the festivities and to all the contestants who competed in the contest. We all had a great time.

Your Bottled Water Has 24,500 Chemicals

How it's screwing up your hormones

Paying $2 for a bottle of water may be more convenient than lugging around your reusable one, but that seemingly small price may have a big impact on your health. German researchers found nearly 25,000 chemicals in a single bottle of water, some of which act like potent pharmaceuticals in your body, according to a study just published in the journal PLoS One.

The study's authors purchased 18 different samples of commercially sold bottled water from France, Italy, and Germany. Using various methods of chemical analysis, they tested the water for its ability to interfere with the body's estrogen and androgen (testosterone and hormone) receptors. The researchers threw in a sample of tap water to act as a sort of ringer, and the results were stunning. The majority of bottled waters tested interfered with hormone receptors to some degree; amounts as little as 0.1 ounces inhibited estrogenic activity by 60% and androgenic activity by 90%. The latter, the researchers wrote, is equivalent to the hormonal activity of the drug flutamide, a drug commonly prescribed to men suffering from prostate cancer. The tap water didn't exhibit any estrogenic or androgenic activity.

For the second part of the study, the scientists investigated which chemicals were causing the reproductive hormonal interferences. They used another form of chemical detection and discovered the water contained 24,520 different chemicals. The most hormonally active belonged to classes of chemicals called maleates and fumarates, which are used to manufacture the form of plastic resins used in water bottles. They can also appear as contaminants of other plastic chemicals.

The mere presence of these chemicals doesn't mean that bottled water is going to cause you major lifelong problems, but it is disturbing. Hormonally active chemicals, usually called endocrine disruptors, are known to interfere with the reproductive development of children, but more research is finding that they can also trigger heart disease, diabetes, and infertility, among other problems, in adults. It's concerning that they make it into bottled water, Bruce Blumberg, PhD, of the University of California–Irvine, told Britain's Royal Society of Chemicals. "It is a bit early to make any strong inferences about how detrimental these chemicals will be toward human health," he says, but adds, "It is certain that they are not beneficial."

Carry a refillable nontoxic glass or stainless steel bottle with you wherever you go, and you'll avoid all those problems—and save a fortune, to boot.
